Joan Miró: Painting and Anti-Painting 1927-1937 | MoMA

The anti-painting of Joan Miró is not an actual technique as it is more of a statement. He didn't mean to violate or to deconstruct the norms and traditions of painting, but rather to remove all sacred qualities and status of the artistic work. It began with his claim: "I want to assassinate painting."

Miró Painting and Anti-painting

What is anti-painting? Generally it connotes a way of creating art without using conventional techniques and materials, though many avant-garde artists have defined it differently. Some of the more outrageous among them have been determined to kick it up a notch and bring about their own revolutionary changes, and in this regard Dali and Picasso are usually cited as prime practitioners.
